

[e1] I personally lean towards large families being worse for children than small families.

[e2] In a larger family resources per child would be more scarce both financially, e.g. college, and parental.

[e3] Of course this argument is based on the assumption that the topic is about families in developed countries, in developing countries larger families can be a necessity to make sure that any of the children live to adulthood.

[e4] In a developed country a child needing interaction with other children would have to interact with their non-family peers, thereby learning valuable social skills.
